MISSOULA--

A course that will explore how increasing world population and decreasing world resources affect the economic development and growth of the Third World will be offered by the UM economics department this summer.

According to Prof. Dennis O'Donnell, who will teach the course, special attention will be devoted to the implications of these problems on U.S. food demand, resource demand and availability, the balance of payments and the value of the dollar.

The course will be taught daily during the second four-week summer session, July 17-August 11, from 10:30 - 11:50 a.m.

A complete list of summer courses and applications are available from the UM Center for Continuing Education and Summer Programs, Main Hall 107, University of Montana, Missoula, MT 59812; 243-2900.
